THE SPORT SHIRT

"I think," said the street car conductor to the motorman, after he had turned the trolley at the end of the line and sunk into one of the seats to snatch a few moments' rest before starting the return trip to the transfer station, "I think I'll get me one of these here 'sport shirts' the young fellers are beginning to wear."

"Well, I'll tell you," replied the motorman, "you'd better take it out in thinking—either that or get the old man to transfer you to some other car than mine, else the company will likely have to buy me a new switch stick, and you'll have to buy one of these silver plates they graft into a guy's bean when his skull's been all mashed up so bad they can't fix it no other way."

"You don't like 'em?" said the conductor, with a rising inflection.

"Yes, I like 'em. I like 'em like Kitchener likes the kaiser. Do you know, I think the patriotic citizens of the town ought to sprinkle insect powder on all the bugs they see wearing them things. But they wouldn't have to do that if the police would enforce the law against men wearing female duds on the street."

"But I was going to a party tomorrow night and wanted to sorter dress up," came back the fare-grabber, somewhat abashed by the violence of the other's speech.

"Dress up? Say, you must get your ideas of dressing up outter the Police Gazette. If you think one of them Willie-boy things is what you ought to wear to a party, I reckon you'd wear a sweater and cap to a wedding, or go in swimming in a dress suit. If there's any one thing they aint', it's dressed up. More'n that, they're a whole lot undressed down. To my way of thinking, a guy that would drape himself up in one of them sport shirts is the kind of a mutt that would spit on his hands with a medicine dropper.

"What I can't get through my noodle is why these here squirts want to wear 'em. It ain't comfort they're after—they could get that in a decent, soft-collared shirt. Do you reckon they think the citizens want to get a free and uncensored view of their manly breastbones or watch their Adam's apples giving a correct imitation of a monkey on a string? If they do, I'd like to let 'em know that I'm one of the public they've got sized up all wrong.

"You mark my word, if this thing keeps up, next thing you know all the gents' furnishing stores will have to start to selling face powder and lace-trimmed handkerchiefs to keep step with
